We have studied the structure and expression of the c-erbB-2 proto-oncogene encoding the epidermal growth factor receptor (EGFR). The expression of EGFR mRNA was studied in fetal and postnatal tissues by Northern blot analysis. The results indicate that EGFR is expressed in a different way during fetal and postnatal life. EGFR mRNA expression was also studied by in situ hybridization in various embryonic and adult tissues. EGFR mRNA was expressed in embryonal and fetal stem cells, cells of the basal layer of the epidermis, intestinal epithelium, and in other tissues such as the developing heart and the dorsal root ganglia. In the brain, EGFR mRNA expression was found only in the cortex. In addition, EGFR protein was detected by Western blotting and immunohistochemistry in tissue samples from normal mice and in transgenic mice expressing the gene encoding EGFR. The distribution of EGFR was investigated by immunohistochemistry. EGFR was expressed in the epidermis of embryos and in various adult tissues. The Q: How can I provide basic authentication for a WCF Service? I have a WCF Service, and I want to provide basic authentication. I found some articles about this, but I get lost in the documentation and example I found. This is what I have done: In my WCF Service I have added a service behavior and I have defined the custom authentication. When I make the request with my client, I get a message: Unable to find a binding that supports the service webHttpBinding and the communication mode wsDualHttpBinding. I am not sure how to solve this.

My Service:

public class MyService : IMyService, IDispatchMessageInspector { private readonly IAuthenticationProvider authenticationProvider;
public MyService(IAuthenticationProvider authenticationProvider) { this.authenticationProvider = authenticationProvider; } public string HelloWorld() { string message; using (var stream = new MemoryStream()) { using (var client = new HttpClient()) { client.BaseAddress = new Uri(""); var cts
= new CancellationTokenSource(); var token = cts.Token;
