It has been supplanting actions like Actions Adobe calls Instance Actions. For example, you can jump from Lightroom to Photoshop and have an instant, custom-built, workflow. You can simply start and save the exported JPG or TIFF file. There are no dialogs, no selections, no anything except the Go To Instance chooser, which asks you what destination you are working from, whether to save the new image to the same place or to anywhere else, or whether you want to append to the existing file. The result is that it is a workflow builder. You can create entire workflows, all actions and effects, starting with an iPhone photo you have edited in Lightroom. (Libraries are a great way to store media when you edit images offline.) The best place to understand this is in the Advanced Editor dialog box in the workflow window. Quite the opposite: Lee Brimelow, VP of Product Innovation and Technology at Adobe, joined the company as a principal technology leader in early 1999. That's when he began investigating opportunities around the browser like Flash, the development outlet for Adobe's creative applications. Although he joined the company just three months before Firefox's initial release, Lee quickly recognized the new browser as a channel for bringing Adobe's creative expertise and tools into the mainstream and began partnering with the Mozilla team to explore browser integration possibilities. Those initial explorations led to his appointment as senior manager of the browser-based video and interactive creative product line in 2000. Flash started in the browser just over a decade ago. The era of Flash in the browser ended much more quickly than many expected, and it's now one of the browser's best-kept secrets. For those who didn't know about Flash, it really seems like it's always been there — the era of the Flash website — and Neverland — the era of the Flash-based website — seems like it's always been there. The Flash site was one of the first "web pages" to provide embedded video, give video a web page-like experience, and connect to the rest of the web and the Internet. 933d7f57e6
