The Photos app in the newer iOS 8 release now allows you to edit your collections (simply tap on the icon). What's nice is that its standalone interface doesn't rely on Lightroom. You can import/export collections as needed. Collections come with an albino theme and support offline editing and viewing of your collections. People who already own Lightroom can now import images into a new collection using the Import from Lightroom function under the Import From... option in Photos. Once you've saved the collection in that form, you can continue editing as you usually would in Lightroom while viewing your iPad display instances of the collection. It's nice that you can view your collections in iOS 8. You can also view more than one display at a time as long as your iPad has a Retina display. They've worked out the bugs of the previous versions, built on top of good design, with heavy emphasis on new features that I'll cover in the following paragraphs. To start, one of Lightroom 5's new features is that Apple automatically backs up each of your collections once a day along with your changes. This works in iCloud. The backup is point and click with a single click. In the event an offline backup is needed, you can select it from the Lightroom 5 menu. Don't worry about those of you who were wondering. The business strategy of providing over 40 years of software and additional services in Lightroom, along with the other tools in the Adobe Creative Cloud is flawless. It's a sound business strategy, and the only downside is that it doesn't cater to a specific type of client. Lightroom is a fantastic tool for any photographer. While its functions make it perfect for M/X or advanced photographers, it does not have enough robust visual tools to really be a viable solution for a less-than-fully knowledgeable photographer.
