The aim of this study was to observe the histological reaction of the periodontal tissue to the progression of the endodontic and the question was whether it would be possible to attribute the success or failure of the endodontic treatment. Material and methods ===== The investigation was performed on 11 healthy male Wistar rats which have an average weight of 300 grams. The teeth were extracted and the tissue around the roots was submitted to histological analysis. The teeth were analyzed with radiography and new compacting resin and new cementum was visible in the cases in which endodontic treatment was successful. No differences were observed between histological analysis of the animals treated or untreated with a classic endodontic technique. Results ===== The control histological analysis of the periodontal tissues demonstrated that soft periodontium is characterized by a thin acellular cementum and a thick periodontal ligament. The detection of new cementum suggests that in these cases the tissue stayed in contact with the new compacting cement, maintaining the potential for future periodontal tissue regeneration. It also verified that new cementum is not present in untreated teeth. Discussion ===== The
